Peter Junker

LOVESICK

_In Starbucks_

A whale-sized cup of coffee is my excuse to keep sitting in a hard chair, looking toward the glass door because of a feeling that you are looking for me, that you will guess where I am, because your desire to find me is so strong.

When you find me, when I see your eyes, I'll be afraid to speak.

Professional help calls this transference, fantasy, delusion, obsession.

But God is said to do just this for us: Find us out in our desire and fear.

My cup of excuses is empty. I am caught in my idolatry of you like a hooked fish with no heart left to fight.

_Be With Me_

at one hour before sunrise in the heart of Tokyo, in the hotel where radio snooze alarms offer birdsong for those guests whose memories of countryside linger.

Be with me on that low bed I recall as lonely at dusk, when the radio offered crickets and owlsong for my soul, a restless foreigner there on business.
Be where the curtain can't avert the glow of Shinagawa's searchlights from our eyes.

Muse

If I forget you, who will make me choose my words with such care? I'm driving from work, working the brake and the gas like a loom treadle: weaving nowhere, fearing someday I'll wake to find myself arrayed in shroud. The stitch of a memory of beauty is all the hint I have that in your arms I was laid slain. But now you're on the lam and I'm wrapped up in myself in my car in my necktie from Hermes of Paris.

Impeachment

My love, I echo what Majority Leader Lott said when he said "I don't think the circumstances now call for something that anybody could interpret as nothing . . . I think we have passed the point where we might wish this thing away." The leader's speech--the mildest of alarms--alarmed me at my morning paper. I was chewing on a bagel after failing to sleep, wishing to interpret my cock away.

14 Years

The mugs, all put-upon inside their nook are slowly losing their perfect edges.
The stovetop rarely but quickly gets hot.
Some dishwater stands fizzling in the sink.

The marriage in its adolescence looks like something bigger than the both of us.
Our love leans on the laminate counter near the cluster tomatoes, maturing with the last green bananas in the bunch, by this week's bag of bargain sandwich loaf.

The Cold Front

Listen, I need to say something about love, and how it feels to break like a cloud when pressure zones mix it up like brawlers, pushing you around familiar landscapes until at last you go spiraling up, far out of sight of all your old gutters.

In the cold, you find yourself to cling to and your self is too much to bear. You fall drop by drop on whatever chance matter cares or doesn't care to catch you. That's all.

Frosty the Snowman

A snow man's a vain thing. He's looking for someplace to look--quick--to see his silk hat, his aristocrat's nose, his artfully sculpted body--quick--before it's all gone.

Where is that polished brook ice where he can see himself? He's a sorry Narcissus, without roots or guts, running from the sun. Were he to pause for the pat of your mittens, he might weep and not stop.
So he runs, teasing the thaw, drop by drop.

Unrequited One

My love is not a flower, but a tree in flower, in spring, in Tallahassee or Talladega: the magnolia, whose thirsty, wandering roots suggest a tree that ever wishes to be somewhere else, whose evergreen leaves never lose their gloss, who grows like a weed in neglected lots yet in hothouses chokes with nonchalance, whose snowy flowers beat all get out, whose heady scent feeds me lemon and apple.

Unrequited Two

I can tell you what flower I am not:
Fritillaria imperialis the emperor of the garden, taller than the hyacinths or begonias, orange with pride and rich with the legend of its humiliation: When Christ hung from the Roman tree, the flowers below bowed in sorrow, all but the emperor, who was thereafter doomed to hang its loud bell-like blooms: limp, abased, and ennobled.

To the Moon
I was unnecessary to you, yet still you allowed me to thrill as I watched your moody rounds, radiant in blue mist.
I'm unnecessary to Christ, who was and is and will be with or without me, yet still plies poets. Thus beauty commands its subjects. One night, in your glow, something told me I'm unnecessary to my love. This is hard, hard to repeat: I've lost you moon oh Christ my love I've lost.

Withdrawal

Shakespeare wasn't afraid of the word, lust, which to him meant an unsated craving for love or revenge or power, animal nature unleashed, soul shaken to its roots, but I'm not Shakespeare, and if I lust for you you won't hear it from me. I presume you perceive my wit: for now, of course, you'll not hear anything from me. You're just a pill for my muse, a slight girl with brown eyes who'll sing when love ends her nauseous, tremor'd hell.

But Then Again

Sometimes I wish the cruelty in me could be purer, less imbued with virtues like concern for you, caution, chastity and amnesia. I would send you e-mails, ten lines of vanity daily, to wit, this fool poetry that rocks me sleepless: rummage sales of tarnished jewelry, clothes gone velvety with wear, and unwound clocks.

Sometimes I wish to make you ponder me more than I ponder you. That's cruelty.

September, 1999

That was the summer of earthquakes. Turkey, Armenia, Taiwan and Mexico grew poorer in lives. Few wanted to see their latest ruins--but the saints who did proclaimed wonders. That was the summer you found me again after I left you for dead to my soul. The emotional tectonics do their work: when our latest kiss draws my lips over the vale of your throat, ages pass in unspeakable beauty.

On My Commute

There is a sign for a watering hole on Roswell Road: A golden face says "Smile Is Our Motto." I ought not, but I smile and drift lanes, wondering, could this be our motto? And if so, could it make us laugh?

And if it did, would God's ears turn red, still ringing with our more somber mottoes picked up on roads whose signs we couldn't read?

I want to stop and lift a golden drink for how the curves of your smile drive me so.
Love Matters

Does it matter? I don't know if it does. It's like this: last night I prepared a feast, grapes and apples, almonds, figs and olives, bread and two cheeses picked for a marriage in our mouths with the perfect sweet Riesling. But you were too preoccupied--telling me you are surely not in love with me and lying on my chest, clasping my hand--to enjoy it. Sometimes love's craved like the chocolate rugalach I forgot to serve.

Love Matters, Finale

Our mandate has changed, my love. Your husband even now is climbing into his truck, his mind filled with thoughts of his turtledove crouched above him, eyes squeezed tight. Isn't it interesting, all the things that we share? But facts being what they are, I am loath to bond with the man beyond feeling your touch in our respective waking dreams. Far be it for me to linger in love's arms. Do I matter? I don't know if I do.

Gentleman in Waiting

Does it hurt? Some. Does it hurt? Some. Does it hurt? Yes, but no more than lazulite, a blue gemstone with a vitreous luster--meaning glassy looking--is made of glass or hurts when the gemcutter's grinder makes it less to make it more. I must believe that your leaving me will have a kinder purpose than to polish my forfeiture:

Only if I die first will it be hell.
Love me one hour before and I'll die well.